TASTE OF SICILY

Immerse yourself in Sicily's rich street food culture with savory snacks that can easily be enjoyed on their own. Starting in Palermo, panelle is one of the most established street market dishes, made from chickpea flour, water, salt, and sometimes parsley or other herbs. The mixture is fried into thin, crispy fritters that are often served on a roll or as a snack on their own. Deep-fried rice balls called arancini are filled with a variety of ingredients like meat, cheese, vegetables, and sometimes seafood. The rice is typically mixed with saffron and coated in breadcrumbs before being fried to perfection. For a fluffier alternative, crocchette are made of mashed potatoes, eggs, and cheese that are rolled into balls, breaded, and fried until crispy. These comfort food delights also can be filled with a variety of ingredients like ham, mushrooms, or spinach for added flavor. You would be remiss to pass up a taste of pani câ meusa, a signature Sicilian sandwich filled with chopped veal spleen—boiled in broth and seasoned with salt, lemon, and parsley—served on a sesame seed bun and optionally topped with ricotta or caciocavallo cheese. If you can't get enough of these delectable eats on the streets of Palermo, you also can stave off hunger with these Sicilian staples while exploring Ortygia's markets.
